Week ending June 14, 2024

Key inflation data came in below expectations last week, helping the Federal Reserve move towards their goal of lower inflation. The headline Consumer Price Index (CPI) came in at an annualized rate of 3.3%, below economists' estimates of 3.4%. Core CPI, which excludes food and energy prices, also came in below expectations with a reading of 3.4%, its lowest level in 3 years. The Producer Price Index (PPI) also came in below expectations with a decline of 0.2% for the month of May. The annual PPI rate came in with a gain of 2.2%

Fixed Income Markets Overview

- The June Federal Reserve Open Market Committee (FOMC) meeting was held last week. As expected, the committee kept rates steady and the current projections by the Fed show the possibility of one interest rate cut this year. The FOMC is still targeting a Fed Funds rate of 3.1% by the end of 2026.
- U.S. Treasury yields fell for the week on the heels of the CPI and FOMC comments.
- Despite the positive CPI reports, inflation is still wearing on the U.S. consumer as noted in this week's University of Michigan Consumer Sentiment Index falling to a 7-month low. Participants' expectations of future inflation rose in the survey.
