Week ending January 16, 2026

Last week, capital markets displayed notable resilience in the face of nonstop geopolitical drama and political headlines. Investors largely looked through events such as rising tensions abroad, questions about the Fed's independence, and aggressive affordability initiatives, focusing instead on stable macro fundamentals. Equity markets continued to benefit from broadening leadership, with small- and mid-cap equities and international markets outperforming traditional mega-cap growth exposure. Inflation data remained stable, extending the trend of moderating price pressures, and economic reports showed strong consumer spending, low layoffs, and upbeat GDP estimates. Corporate earnings trends remain constructive, with expectations for a tenth consecutive quarter of year-over-year profit growth led by strength across all eleven S&P 500 sectors. Fixed income markets saw yields drift modestly higher, driven in part by speculation over the next Federal Reserve Chair and persistent strength in economic data. Meanwhile, commodity markets reflected ample global supply, with crude prices remaining near five-year lows despite geopolitical risks. Altogether, the week reinforced a consistent theme: fundamentals—not headlines—continue to drive markets forward.

Fixed Income Markets Overview

- Treasury yields moved slightly higher, with the 10-year yield approaching 4.23%, its highest level since September. There was a modest continuation of the recent steepening trend with the 2-year rising 5 basis points and the 10-year increasing 6 bps.
- Market-implied expectations for early-2026 rate cuts declined following firm economic data and stable inflation readings. Retail sales and labor-market strength contributed to reduced rate-cut probabilities across March (fell from 30% to 23%), April (fell from 49% to 39%), and June (fell from 100% to 80%).
- CPI and PPI reports showed core inflation pressures easing at the margin but still elevated on a year-over-year basis.
- Comments from major banks signaled resilient consumer credit quality and steady small-business lending activity.

Equity Markets Overview

- All three major indices fell modestly last week, but remain near all-time highs. The S&P 500 moved sideways after setting a fresh ATH on Monday, ending just below record territory.
- Market breadth improved across the major indices, with over 70% of S&P 500 companies and 50% of Nasdaq members trading above their 200-day moving averages, highlighting a healthier market foundation.
- Smaller and more cyclically-tilted stocks led the way again, outpacing mega-cap technology names. While flows can change directions quickly, the rotation out of mega-cap tech into other sectors continues to build momentum to start 2026.
- Software stocks faced renewed pressure while chipmakers benefited from strong earnings at TSMC and optimism around AI-related demand.
- Big banks kicked off earnings season with mixed but generally stable results.
- International markets were strong, especially Japan, which saw a sizable rally. China recorded record trade surplus data on the back of solid export growth.

Alternative Markets Overview

- Gold ended last week up 2.5%, having hit a record high above $4,600 per ounce on Wednesday before easing later in the week.
- Oil prices stayed low, continuing to provide relief for consumers. The International Energy Agency expects global oil markets to be well-supplied this year, easing concerns about price spikes. Gasoline prices remained muted, helping keep inflation pressures in check and providing some relief to consumers.
- Crypto markets saw early gains fade after Coinbase pulled support for a key policy proposal. Lawmakers paused discussion of the "Clarity Act" after disagreements arose, particularly around crypto exchanges' ability to provide benefits on stablecoin holdings. Stablecoin-related regulation remains a tension point between traditional banks and digital-asset firms.
